Solar-powered ATMs to deliver clean drinking water

LAHORE: Punjab province is set to launch an innovation for water-short Pakistan: Solar-powered ATMs that dispense clean water when a smart card is scanned. The two-foot-square prototype machine looks and functions like an ATM, but dispenses water instead of cash. Users are issued a card they can use to claim their daily share of water. The project, a collaboration between the Punjab Saaf Pani (Clean Water) company and the Innovations for Poverty Alleviation Lab (IPAL), a research centre in Lahore, aims to install a solar-powered ATM on each of a series of water filtration plants being established in rural urban fringe areas of Punjab province. The machine is designed to help the government collect water waste and ensure people have access to clean water, said Muhammad Abbasi, a programme manager at IPAL. "The innovative machines will help the government maintain a record of the exact quantity of clean drinking water being dispensed in a day in a specific locality, besides ensuring its quality," he said. The quality and quantity of water being dispensed will be tracked in real time online, through a control panel, he said.

The devices play an audio message upon authentication of a smart card, after which they dispense water for the user. Green and red buttons enable the user to start and stop the flow of water. A flow control meter measures how much water is dispensed.
