hegemony that could turn these countries into China's vassals.

It is not European countries alone that have voiced concerns about China's Belt and Road Initiative, the United States, Australia, Japan and India have also said recently they will join hands to create an alternative regardless of numerous obstacles to reach other countries established or visible and invisible means about their roles, but the market plays the decisive role. Such a model will offer countries whose market economy has not been fully developed an all-new option in the pursuit of industrialisation and will help them resolve the problems which the West's issues. But only when Western misgivings over China's development model disappear, will their doubts over the Belt and Road Initiative disappear as well.

As the Belt and Road Initiative irrefutably risks losing the world if it is being cre-
