BEIRUT: When builder Salem repairs a shell hole house in rebel-held south Syria, he knows it might not be the last job he does on structure.

"There is a chance the buildings will be hit again," he tells Reuters.

"But in the short term people should be able to take refuge in their homes."

"Abu Salem heads a group of 12 construction workers who rebuild and patch buildings damaged by barrages, air strikes and shellings in and around Syria's Damascus."

With no access to modern tools, and materials made expensive by the war, Abu Salem's men break up buildings, mix concrete and carry loads by hand.

Despite the difficulties, they have kept their sense of humour.

Three months ago a video circulated widely on Syrian social media showing masked men kneeling in formation.
