4 days of violence last week

KABUL

Afghan President Ashraf Ghani's main government partner said on Monday his national security adviser and other top security officials should be removed after four days of violence last week left around 100 people dead.

A massive truck bomb attack on Wednesday killed more than 80 people and wounded hundreds more, leading to violent protests over the lack of security.

At least four people were killed during the protests in clashes with police. The bloodshed continued on Saturday when suicide bomber struck a funeral for one of the victims of the protests, killing at least six people and prompting calls for National Security Adviser Hanif Atmar and other security chefs to step down.

"There is a big problem with the heads of the security institutions," said Salahuddin Rabbani, foreign minister and head of Jamiat-e-Islami Afghanistan, the party behind Chief Executive Abdullah Abdullah.

"They should be removed," Ghani has appealed for unity and promised an investigation into the actions of police who fired on protesters.

But the violent days and the outburst of anger over security has ratcheted up the government's position under intense pressure over the past few weeks.

The tensions, worsened in the wake of a clear directive from Washington, have created the situation.

President Donal Trump's administration is out of its policy in Afghanistan. As a result, the former rivals, Abdullah after the election of 2014, in Afghanistan's Unity Government at odds since the start of Abdullah's ma
