Pakistan OBSERVER

from Senegal, bound for more than 3,000 km. "Here we go," said Ben Hooper, as he took his goggles and said good-bye to his loved ones and supporters on the beach of an hotel in Dakar, in the east of Senegal. The whole world thank you very much for your support," he said before striding into the water at the start of the record-breaking attempt, expected to take several months.

Hooper was supposed to have crossed Africa's western coast from Dakar, Senegal at the start of November but delayed his departure due to a problem with the support vessel. He postponed it again several times, until actually setting off on Sunday. He has been preparing for over three years for the immense journey that will see him swim up to 10 hours a day across the Atlantic. "It has been a long time coming," he said.

Hooper was inspired to attempt the feat by two fearless English explorers: Ranulph Fiennes, who reached both the North and South poles overland, and Vivian Fuchs, the first man to cross the Antarctic on foot.—AFP

ouldered on a grand staircase at the center to express solidarity with the word "Trump!" was written on the door of a Muslim center in the space at the school. Students spoke of friends who wore scarves or other traditional clothing and were afraid to take the transportation home for fear of being harassed.

Sana Mayat, a 21-year-old girl who wears the hijab, said the election made her realize there was a large part of this country that didn't want me here."

"There is an intense state of anxiety about the future," said Ammi Nashashibi, a parent of a child and executive director of Chicago's Inner-City Muslim Action Network, which has been inundated with calls seeking support since Election Day. She grappled with the conversation she had to have with my children."

The outcome was especially bitter following an unprecedented voter registration drive by American Muslims, including get-out-the-vote events at mosques and the creation of a political action committee, the Muslim American Political Action Committee (MAPAC), to mobilize Arabs and Muslims.—AP
